From the Old Celtic (and Latin) Britto, BRITON, there was subsequently formed the proper name of an eponymous hero, the reputed first king and founder of Britain. His name appears in Nennius also as Bruto, in the Irish version as Britus and Brutus. In the latter form he was linked with classical antiquity and the tale of Troy, being made a great-grandson of Æneas. Brutus accordingly became the prevailing form in Latin writers; and was adapted in Welsh and OF. as Brut. Of this the sense was transferred through that of 'chronicle or history of Brut' to that of 'chronicle of Britain' or 'Welsh chronicle' generally: see BRUT. But its use as a proper name was not forgotten, and in the 16th c. it appears to have given rise to sense 2.]

buck (bʌk), sb.[1] Forms: (sense 'he-goat') 1 bucca, 2–3 buc, 3–4 bucke, 4–6 bukke; (senses 'male deer', etc.) 1, 5 buc, 3–5 bok, 4–7 bukke, bucke, 5 buk, 4– buck. [Orig. two words, OE. buc and bucca, which became indistinguishable in form after 11th c. So far as the evidence goes, OE. buc was used for the male deer, and bucca for the he-goat, but the instances are so few that it is far from certain that the words were thus distinguished in meaning. OE. buc = MDu. boc, Du. bok, OHG. bocch (MHG. boc, mod.G. bock), ON. bukkr (Sw. bock, Da. buk), all meaning primarily 'he-goat', though in each of the mod. langs. applied to male animals of the deer kind (in Da. also to the ram):—OTeut. bukko-z.* This was adopted (only in the sense 'he-goat') in F. bouc, Pr., Cat. boc, OSp. buco (Diez); also, in same sense, as Welsh bwch, Ir., Gael. boc. The extended form represented by

OE. bucca (:—OTeut. bukkon-*) appears to exist in ON. bokki 'my good fellow, old buck' (Vigf.), but is otherwise peculiar to English. (With OTeut. bukko-* Fick compares Zend bûza he-goat, also Skr. bukka he-goat; but the Teutonic does not phonetically correspond to these. Franck thinks it doubtful whether the word is native Teutonic, or rather an early adoption from some other language.)] buckram ('bʌkrəm), sb. Forms: 3, 5 bukeram, (4 bougeren), 4, 6 bukram, 5 bokram, 5–6 bokeram, -ham, 6 bocram(e, -keram, bucram, -um, buckeram(e, -mme, 6–7 buckrom, -erom, -orome, 8 buchram, 6- buckram. [Found in most of the European langs. between 12th and 15th c.; cf. OF. boquerant (12th c.), bouqueran, bouquerrant, bouguerant, mod.F. bougran, Pr. bocaran, Cat. bocaram (Diez), Sp. bucaran, It. bucherame (in Boccaccio 14th c.), med.L. (in France) boquerannus, bucaranus, (in Italy) buchiranus; also MHG. buggeram, buggeran, buckeram, MDu. bocraen, bocrael, bollecraen, boucraen. In early continental and apparently in early Eng. use it denoted a costly and delicate fabric, sometimes of cotton and sometimes of linen; but it afterwards acquired the sense of coarse gummed linen used for linings, thus becoming synonymous with Sp. bocací, F. boucassin, BOCASIN; and this meaning it retains in modern Eng., Fr., and It. (The MHG. lexicographers state that in that lang. the word meant 'a fabric of goat's hair', but this explanation may perhaps be a conjecture founded on a supposed derivation from Ger. bock BUCK sb.[1]) As the Eng. forms generally have m, while all the Fr. forms have n, it is possible that the word may have been adopted into Eng. not from Fr. but from Italian. For the history of the word in Europe, and its probable changes of meaning, see Col. Yule's Marco Polo I. 46–48 and 59.

Of the ultimate etymology nothing is really known. Some refer to It. bucherare 'to pierce full of holes', supposing that the name was first given to a kind of muslin or net (cf. quot. 1548 in 1). Reiske (in Constantin. Porphyrog. ed. Niebuhr II. 530) proposes Arab abū qirām 'pannus cum intextis figuris', but he does not say where he found this compound; the simple qirām is of doubtful meaning, the native lexicographers quoted in the Qāmūs giving the various renderings 'red veil', 'striped and figured woollen cloth', 'thin veil' (Freytag, s.v.). Others suggest derivation from Bokhara, or from Bulgaria, but this does not agree with the early Fr. forms.]

Skr. buddha enlightened, awakened, pa. pple. of budh to awake, know, perceive.] The title given by the adherents of one of the great Asiatic religions, thence called BUDDHISM, to the founder of their faith, Śākyamuni, Gautama, or Siddārtha, who flourished in Northern India in the 5th century B.C. bug (bʌg), sb.[1] Obs. or dial. Forms: 4–7 bugge, 6–8 bugg, 6– bug. [ME. bugge, possibly from Welsh bwg (= bug) 'a ghost', quoted in Lhwyd's Archæologia Brit. (1707) 214, from the MS. Welsh Vocabulary of Henry Salesbury (born 1561). Owen Pugh has bwg 'hobgoblin, scarecrow'; but the word is apparently now known chiefly in its derivatives. When bug became current as the name of an insect (see BUG sb.[2]), this sense fell into disuse, and now survives only in the compound BUGBEAR. Cf. BOGY[1], BUGABOO.

Although Salesbury's evidence takes the Welsh word back only to the latter half of the 16th c., before which there was plenty of time for its adoption from the Eng. bugge, bug, its Welsh nativity is strongly supported by a numerous family of derivatives, e.g. bwgan (= 'bugan) bugbear, scarer, bwgwth to terrify, threaten, bwgwl (= 'bugul) terror, terrifying, threatening, whence bygylu (= bə'gəly) to terrify, threaten, bygwydd (= 'bʌgwɪð) hobgoblin, phantom. The S. Wales bwci ('buki) can however scarcely be a derivative, but looks like an adoption of ME. bugge, or modern bogy. With these Welsh words cf. Manx boag, boagáne 'bugbear, bogle, sprite' (whence boaganach frightful, boagandoo scarecrow), the Irish bocán hobgoblin, Gael. bochdan (? for bocan) hobgoblin (though these cannot be actually cognate with Welsh bwgan). Owen Pugh has also bygel nos 'phantom', which seems however to be an error for bugail nos, in Breton buguel-nos 'shepherd or lad of the night'.]

bug (bʌg), sb.[2] [Etymology unknown. Forms: Inf. 3–4 bulde(n, 4 bylden, bilden, (bield, byle), (4–5 belde(n, beelde), 4–6 byld(e, bild(e, 5 buylden, 5–6 buyld(e, 6 builde, (byeld, beald, Sc. beild), 6– build. Pa. t. 4 bildide, (bult), 4–5 bild(e, 5 buylde, byld, bylled, 5–6 bylded, -yd, buylded, (6 Sc. belt), 6– built, builded. Pa. pple., 2 ȝebyld, 4 i-, y-buld, y-beld, bilde, bulde, bilt, (bilid), 5 bild, bylte, beldid, bildid, 6 bylded, bylt, (bylled, -yd), buylded, -yt, buylt, (i-bylt), (8 build), 6– built, builded. [ME. bulden(ü), bylden, bilden:—OE. byldan* to build (recorded only in pa. pple. ȝebyld), f. bold a dwelling. Hence the two fundamental senses are 'to construct a dwelling' and 'to take up one's abode, dwell'. The normal modern spelling of the word would be bild (as it is actually pronounced); the origin of the spelling bui- (buy- in Caxton), and its retention to modern times, are difficult of explanation.

The OE. pple. ȝebyld might be from a compound ȝebyldan: but cf. the southern bytlan (Gregory's Past. Care 153, l. 9–10), later bytlian (see Bosw.-Toller), f. buplo-* (whence botl, bold), which points to the antiquity of the vb. (Not to be confounded with OE. byldan, ȝebyldan, for bieldan to make bold: see BIELD.)]

I. To erect a building.

1. a. trans. Orig. To construct for a dwelling; to erect (a house), make (a nest). Hence, To erect, construct (any work of masonry), and by extension, To construct by fitting together of separate parts; chiefly with reference to structures of considerable size, as a ship or boat, a carriage, an organ, a steam-engine (not, e.g. a watch or a piano). Const. of, more rarely from, out of, with (the material), on (the foundation). In early mod. Eng. used with up without change of meaning; but to build up (in literal sense) now implies a contrast with pulling down, or with a previous state of decay, as 'to build up again'. to build a fire: to arrange or pile the fuel. to build a railroad, said in U.S., is unknown in England.

bulk (bʌlk), sb.[1] Forms: 5 bolk(e, 5–7 bulke, 6 bulcke, boulke, bowlke, (5–6, 9 Sc. bowk, see BOUK), 7 bulck, (boak), 6– bulk. [Of complicated etymology. The coincidence in meaning with ON. bulki*, Icel. búlki 'heap, cargo of a ship' (Vigf.), Da. bulk lump, clod (cf. mod.Icel. búlka-st to be bulky), suggests that the word, though not recorded before 15th c., may (in the senses 'heap', 'cargo') be of Scandinavian origin. Within a few years of its first appearance, bulk occurs in the senses 'belly, trunk of the body', due app. to confusion with BOUK, which word it has entirely superseded in literary English. (Cf. however, the Flemish bulck 'thorax' in Kilian.) The sense of 'size' (branch III) seems to have been evolved chiefly from the notion of 'body', though it may be partly due to that of 'heap' or 'cargo'. The form boak, used by N. Fairfax 1674 indiscriminately with bulk in the sense of 'magnitude', is apparently:—ME. bolk.] bullion[2] ('bʊlɪən). Forms: 5 bullioun(e, (Sc. bulȝeon), 6 bolion, -lyon, bulloyn, 6–7 bullyon, 7 bulloin, -oigne, (bullen, bulline), 5- bullion. [Of obscure etymology. First recorded as AF. bullion (see quot. 1336 in 1); the form appears to point to identity with F. bouillon, med.L. bullio 'boiling' (cf. prec.), but it does not appear that the word ever had, except in England, any of the senses defined below. If this etymology be correct, the sense of 'boiling' must have undergone a purely English development into those of 'melting', 'melted mass of metal'; the applications quoted under the preceding sb. (which are common to OF. and Eng.) probably furnished the suggestion for this extension of meaning. In MDu. boelioen seems to have had the sense of alloyed gold or silver (ef. 3, 4); see Verwijs & Verdam, who however identify the word with billioen, a. Fr. billon. The conjecture that bullion is in some way derived from L. bulla in the sense of seal or stamp appears to fail both with regard to form and meaning. The Fr. billon base metal (see BILLON) is unconnected in origin, but it seems to have influenced sense 4 of the present word; on the other hand, some obs. senses of Fr. billon seem to have been imitated from those of Eng. bullion.]

bully ('bʊlɪ), *sb.*¹ Also 6 bullye. [Etymology obscure: possibly ad. Du. boel 'lover (of either sex)', also 'brother' (Verwijs & Verdam); cf. MHG. buole, mod.Ger. buhle 'lover', earlier also 'friend, kinsman'. Bailey 1721 has boolie 'beloved' as an 'old word'. Bully can hardly be identical with Sc. BILLIE, brother, but the dial. sense 2 seems to have been influenced by that word. There does not appear to be sufficient reason for supposing that the senses under branch II. are of distinct etymology: the sense of 'hired ruffian' may be a development of that of 'fine fellow, gallant' (cf. bravo); or the notion of 'lover' may have given rise to that of 'protector of a prostitute', and this to the more general sense. In the popular etymological consciousness the word is perhaps now associated with BULL *sb.*¹; cf. BULLOCK v.]

Prof. Skeat, regarding the word as ultimately Scandinavian, derives it from the words represented in Eng. by BOLE and WORK, in which case the primitive sense would be 'a work constructed of tree-trunks'. Others would connect the first element with the MHG. verb boln to throw, on the ground that the MHG. word seems in some cases to have meant a machine for throwing large stones. Both etymologies are found in early mod. German authors. The Teut. word was borrowed in French as boullewerc, bollewerc, whence boulever, mod. BOULEVARD.]

bun (bʌn), sb.[2] Forms: 4–7 bunne, 5 bonn(e, 8–9 bunn, 5– bun. [Etymology doubtful. The mod. provincial Fr. bugne is said by Burguy and by Boiste (1840), to be used at Lyons for a sort of fritter; the word is not recorded in OF. with this sense, but bugne, beugne (= mod. bigne) occurs with the sense of 'swelling produced by a blow'; the dim. bugnete is found in OF. with the sense of 'fritter', and bugnets given by Cotgr. (1611) as a synonym of bignets (now beignets), explained by him as 'little round loaves, or lumpes made of fine meale, oyle or butter, and reasons; bunnes, Lenten loaves'. (Cf. Sp. buñuelo bun, fritter.) It is conjectured that OF. bugne, originally 'swelling' may have had the unrecorded sense of 'puffed loaf' (= bugnet), and may have been adopted into English as bun. But the existence of this sense in OF. is at present hypothetical, and it is questionable whether such a derivation would account for the form of the Eng. word.]

1. a. A sort of cake: the use differs greatly in different localities, but the word generally denotes in England a sweet cake (usually round) not too large to be held in the hand while being eaten. In Scotland it usually means a very rich description of cake, the substance of which is almost entirely composed of fruit and spice; the richest kind of currant bread. In some places, as in the north of Ireland, it means a round loaf of ordinary bread. In the earliest examples the meaning is doubtful, the context merely indicating some kind of loaf or cake. (See CROSS-BUN.) Slang phrases: to take the bun, to take the cake (see CAKE sb. 7); a bun in the oven, a child conceived; to do one's bun (N.Z. slang), to lose one's temper.

A derivation from F. bourre 'rough hair, flock of wool', labours under the difficulty that the F. word is not found ever to have had the sense which Eng. bur shares with Da. and Sw. borre; nor does the Eng. word show the wider sense of F. bourre.

The spelling of this and various other words or senses of words, phonetically and perhaps even etymologically identical with it, is very unsettled: in nearly all burr is an earlier spelling, but in the present word bur is now usual. See further under BURR.]

There are several similar forms in Romanic: It. borbogliare to make a rumbling or grumbling noise, Pg. borbulhar, Sp. borbollar to bubble forth, also mod. Picard borbouller to murmur (Diez); all apparently imitative words, though Diez thinks the Sp. and Pg. possibly formed on L. bulla bubble. The Eng. word can hardly have any actual connexion with these, exc. as a parallel onomatopœia, expressing the sound made by the agitation, issuing forth, or flowing of a liquid mixed with vesicles of air or gas. Of this the later BUBBLE appears to have been either a simple variant or a conscious modification. In the later use of burble there is more of the notion of flowing than in bubble, as though burble combined the notions of bubble and purl; but the sb. burble was in 14–16th c. exactly = L. bulla 'bubble'.]

[A word of obscure origin, found in the earliest ME. in form burde, frequent in Layamon, but afterwards chiefly in northern, or north midl. writers, and in alliterative verse.

Burd has been variously identified with BIRD sb., and with BRIDE. Although its later spelling is identical with the mod.Sc. form of bird, and it has been sometimes treated as merely a fig. use of this word, the earlier forms of both show them to be quite distinct. The identification with bride has somewhat more plausibility; but even if we take as the basis the Da. brud instead of the OE. brýd, the phonetic difficulties are many and serious. The various ME. spellings seem to indicate that the vowel was ü = OE. y; some of them also favour a dissyllabic form. The OE. adj. byrde 'wealthy', or perhaps 'well-born, noble' answers phonetically, and the sense 'well-born' or 'wealthy lady', would apparently make it a suitable companion-word to beorn. But the rarity of the OE. adj. (found once, Oros. I. i. 15, and there masc., se byrdesta 'the wealthiest man') presents obvious difficulties.]

The prevalent form is now burden, but burthen is still often retained for 'capacity of a ship', and also as a poet. or rhetorical archaism in other senses. Of the senses in Branch IV, some are derived from the Romanic BOURDON[2], influenced by the Eng. burden; others belong to the native word with more or less influence from bourdon. The fusion of the two words is so complete that it is not possible to treat Branch IV as an independent sb.]

IV. Senses showing confusion with bourdon[2].

[The earliest quotation for bourdon[2] shows that word already confused with this. Apparently the notion was that the bass or undersong was 'heavier' than the air. The bourdon usually continued when the singer of the air paused at the end of a stanza, and (when vocal) was usually sung to words forming a refrain, being often taken up in chorus; hence sense 10. As the refrain often expresses the pervading sentiment or thought of a poem, this use became coloured by the notion of 'that which is carried' by the poem; its 'gist' or essential contents.]

(Spurious forms only Hist. and in Dicts.: 7 brodehalpeny, -halfpeny, broodhalpeny, -halfepeny, broadhalfepenny, bordhalpeny, -halfpeny, 8–9 bordhalfpenny.) [Of uncertain form and meaning; perh. f. burghal, or some other deriv. of BOROUGH, + PENNY.]

A municipal tax of some kind; in ancient charters certain monasteries are exempted from paying it.

Cowell's guess (quot. 1607) adopted by later writers, appears to be founded on an erroneous derivation. Apparently the word became obs. early in 15th c.; perhaps even long before that time, as the examples in the later charters may be merely repetitions of a conventional formula.

burgine, -gione, obs. forms of BURGEON.

burglar ('bɜ:glə(r)), sb. Also 6 burglour, burghlar, burgleyer, 7 burglare, -layer. [Found in AFr. in 16th c.: ad. Anglo-Lat. burglator (13th c.), burgulator (16th c.), altered form of burgator (13th c.), perhaps f. the first element of burgh-breche, the native Eng. term for burglary. The Anglo-Lat. verb burgulare (quasi 'to burgle') is recorded in 1354 (Assis. 27 Edw. III, quoted in Reeves Hist. Eng. Law ed. Finlason II. 419). The 13th c. AF. word for 'burglar', burgesour, burgeysour, is of obscure formation, but of the same ultimate origin. The related BURGLARY is in legal AF. burglarie, in Anglo-Lat. burgaria, burgeria (early 13th c.), for which burglaria is found in 16th c. The origin of the intrusive l, in burglator, burglaria, and the corresponding Eng. forms, is not clear; but the notion of Lambarde (1581) and later writers that the ending -lar represents AF. ler-s, laroun (:—L. 'latro, la'trōnem) thief, is contrary to the evidence. A 'burglator' or 'burgesour' was not necessarily a 'latro'; his object might be something else than plunder.

No corresponding words are known in continental OF. or med.L.; the rare OF. burger 'saccager, piller' (Godef.), occurring in Garnier's Vie de Saint Thomas, is unconnected, unless perhaps this sense of the word may be due to AF. influence.]

A connexion is often assumed with brunn- ablaut-stem of OTeut. brin-n-an* BURN v.[1], on the supposition that that root had originally the wider sense 'well up, be in commotion', applicable to water as well as to fire; but of this there is no actual evidence. Gr. φρέαρ a well, supposing the root to be the same with that of L. fervēre to boil up; but the form of the Teut. word does not permit this explanation.]

[The modern verb represents two earlier verbs, viz. (1) the intransitive strong vb., Goth. brinnan, (brann, brunnum; brunnans), ON. brinnan (later brennan), OS., OHG., MHG. brinnan, OE. brinnan, by metathesis birnan, bernan, beornan*, (bran, barn, born, bearn; burnon, bornen) 'ardere'; and (2) the derived factitive weak vb., Goth. brannjan (brannida, brannips), ON. brenna, OS., OHG. brenn(i)an, (MHG. and Ger. brennen), OE. bærnan (by metathesis for brennan), bærnde, 'urere'. Beornan and bærnan were still distinct in OE., but ran together early in the ME. period. ME. had four types of the present stem, bern-, brin(n-, barn-, bren(n-, the two former of which appear to represent the intr., and the third the trans. OE. verb; bren(n- appears to be mainly the ON. brenna, but may partly have originated by metathesis from bern-. Of the original strong verb, the strong pa. t. does not appear later than Layamon, and the distinction of transitive and intransitive was soon lost, the different types being used indiscriminately as to sense, though with dialectal preferences. Brenne, brent was the most common type in late ME., and even down to the 16th c., when it was somewhat abruptly dispossessed by burn, burnt, app. the descendant of the earlier bern-, birn-, though the continuity is not very clearly made out, as, between the 13th and 16th c., this type is scarcely recorded in Sc. writers.

In the Teut. brinn-an it is considered that only brin- (:—Aryan bhren*) belongs to the root, the second n being originally a present suffix: cf. OE. bryne:—OTeut. bruni-z* burning. The root does not appear outside Teutonic: the comparisons often made rest on the untenable assumption that the n of brin- is not radical.

The distinction in usage between the two modern forms of the pa. t. and pa. pple. is difficult to state with precision. Burnt is now the prevailing form, and its use is always permissible; burned is slightly archaic, and somewhat more formal in effect; it occurs more frequently as pa. t., or in combination with the auxiliary have than as ppl. adj.]

burr, bur (bɜ:(r)), sb.[1] Also 7 burgh, 6–7 burre. [Derivation obscure: nor is it at all clear whether the senses under II and III ought not to be treated as separate words. But the co-existence of the form BURROW sb.[5] (q.v.) with BURR sense 5, and its explanation as 'a circle about the moon', seem to identify this with the burwhe, burrowe of the Promptorium, the phonetic variants being analogous to fur, furrow; while the form burgh, besides burre, as well as the sense of II, appears equally to point back to the same ME. forms. For the source of the ME. see BROUGH.]

I. 1. General sense: A circle.

4. (See BURR-PUMP.)

III. 5. A circle of light round the moon (or a star); a BROUGH. The original sense seems to have been merely 'circle, halo'; but in modern use there is usually the notion of a nebulous or nimbous disc of light enfolding the luminary; as if modified by association with BUR sb.

burr, bur, sb.[3] [Etymol. uncertain. Though the sense approaches that of BORE sb.[1], connexion with that appears to be phonetically impossible. Mr. E. B. Poulton suggests that the general notion is that of 'a roughness or scar, which looks artificial or as if resulting from accident—the look presented by an ear (beyond any other organ of special sense) in birds, and other animals which have not the external pinna possessed by mammals'. This would connect it with the following word, or even with BUR sb.]

The external meatus of the ear, the opening leading to the tympanum.

(This is clear in quot. 1688, since hawks have nothing but an opening; so practically the cropt-eared dog in quot. 1677; quot. 1573 refers to the secretion of wax in the meatus of the ear, and (as was formerly supposed) in the parotid glands or 'kernels of the ears' (though it might be read as identifying the 'burres' with the 'kirnels'). Dr. Johnson's explanation 'the lobe or lap of the ear' was an unfortunate guess, servilely followed by later dictionaries.)

[(1) A Common Teut. strong vb.: OE. berstan (pa. t. bærst, burston, pple. borsten) = OFris. bersta, OS. brestan (brast, bruston; brostan), (MDu., Du. berstan, barsten, LG. barsten, basten), OHG. brestan (MHG. brestan, Ger. bersten from LG.), ON. bresta, (brast, brustum; brostinn), (Sw. brista, Da. briste):—OTeut. brestan*, possibly from brek-st-an*, a derivative (intensive) of brek-an to BREAK[2].

(2) The earlier brest- of WGer. became by metathesis berst- in OE., Frisian, Du., and LG. (whence also it has passed into mod.Ger. in place of MHG. brest-). In Eng. this berst- mostly again became brest- in ME., partly perh. under Norse influence, whence the pa. pple. brosten still, in north. dial.; but this has since the 16th c. gone back to berst, changed by the disturbing influence of r to burst. So that we have the alternate series OTeut. and WGer. brest-, OE. berst-, ME. brest, mod.Eng. berst, burst. But the 15-16th c. had often brust and brast, barst in the present; and the north. dial. had brist, bryst, as in Danish.

(3) The original strong conjugation survived during the ME. period, with the typical forms, after metathesis, bresten, brast, brosten, but with much disturbance and mixture of forms in 14-15th c. In the 16th c. a very common form was brast for all the principal parts; but about the end of that century, burst (for all the parts) began to gain the ascendancy which it has since maintained, though the pa. t. was frequently brast in 17th and the pa. pple. bursten till 18th c. Various old forms survive dialectally, and in U.S. the pa. t. and pple. are frequently bursted, vulgarly busted.]

1. A measure of capacity used for corn, fruit, etc., containing four pecks or eight gallons.

The imperial bushel, legally established in Great Britain in 1826, contains 2218.192 cubic inches, or 80 pounds of distilled water weighed in air at 62° Fah. The Winchester bushel, much used from the time of Henry VIII, was somewhat smaller, containing 2150.42 cubic inches or 77.627413 pounds of distilled water; it is still generally used in United States and Canada. The bushel had a great variety of other values, now abolished by law, though often, in local use, varying not only from place to place, but in the same place according to the kind or quality of the commodity in question. Frequently it was no longer a measure, but a weight of so many (30, 40, 45, 50, 56, 60, 70, 75, 80, 90, 93, 220) pounds of flour, wheat, oats, potatoes, etc. A full account of these local values is given in Old Country & Farming Words (Eng. Dial. Soc.) 169.

busk (BASK), sb.[1] Also 6–7 buske. [a. F. busc, of uncertain origin. Scheler regards it as a doublet of F. bois wood:—late L. boscum (see BUSH sb.[1]); cf. the related F. bûche, OF. busche fem., splinter of wood. In Fr. as in Eng. the word was formerly sometimes used for the whole corset, and Littré considers it cognate with It. busto (see BUST); but this is unsatisfactory with regard to both sense and form.]

A strip of wood, whalebone, steel, or other rigid material passed down the front of a corset, and used to stiffen and support it. Formerly and still dial. applied also to the whole corset.

buskin ('bʌskɪn). Also 6 buskyn(g, busken, 6–7 buskine, busgin. [A word existing in many European langs.: known in Eng. since 16th c. Cf. Fr. brousequin (16th c.), early mod.Du. brōzeken (now broosken), Sp. borceguí, formerly also boszegui, Pg. borzeguim (Dozy cites as earlier forms morsequill, mosequin), It. borzacchino; the synonymous Fr. brodequin, BRODEKIN, q.v., is doubtless related, but the phonetic relations are obscure. The special source of the Eng. is uncertain: the early mention of 'Spanish buskin' might suggest that it was adopted from Spain, a view in some degree supported by the fact that OSp. boszeguí (Minsheu) is the only continental form without the r. (The Sp. word appears to have originally had a final n: cf. borceguinero buskin maker.) But it is not impossible that the Eng. word was corrupted from Fr. or Du.

The ultimate etymology is unknown. Diez regarded the Romanic words as a. Du. brōzeken, and this as a dim. of brōze, supposed by him to be ultimately ad. late L. byrsa leather. But the wide diffusion of the word in Romanic and its late appearance in Du. are inconsistent with this hypothesis, which Dutch etymologists decisively reject (see BRODEKIN); and the Romanic forms do not admit of derivation from byrsa. The appearance of the Sp. and Pg. words suggests an oriental origin, but the Arabic etymology proposed by Dozy is far-fetched and untenable. The OF. broissequin, brusquin, the name of a woollen fabric, is prob. unconnected; Godef. says that the material was so called from its colour: cf. BRUSK.]

[The form bustard in 15th c. appears to be exclusively English, and looks like a mixture of the two OF. forms bistarde and oustarde, both going back to L. avis tarda, the name given to the bird, according to Pliny, in Spain. This name, if purely Latin, would mean 'slow bird', but 'the application of the epithet is not understood' (Prof. Newton), as the bird is remarkably swift on foot, and, though averse to flight, capable of great speed when compelled to take wing. Prof. Newton suggests that tarda may have been a sb.; perh. avis tarda is a mere etymologizing alteration of a non-Latin name. Hence Pg. abetarda, betarda, Sp. avutarda, It. ottarda, Pr. austarda. The Eng. form bistard was of later appearance, taken directly from Fr.]

but (bʌt), prep., conj., adv. Forms: 1 be-útan (only as prep. or adv.), bútan, -on, -un, búta, búte, 2–3 buten, 2–4 bute, (2–3 boten, 2–4 bote, 3–7 Sc. bot), 3– but. [The OE. adv. and prep. be-útan, bútan, búta, 'on the outside, without', of which the strong form regularly became in ME. bouten, boute, BOUT, as adv. and prep., was phonetically weakened to bŭten, bŭte, but, as a conjunction, with uses arising immediately out of the prepositional sense. In some of these uses, the conjunction is, even in modern English, not distinctly separated from the preposition: the want of inflexions in substantives, and the colloquial use of me, us, for I, we, etc., as complemental nominatives in the pronouns, making it uncertain whether but is to be taken as governing a case. In other words 'nobody else went but me (or I)' is variously analysed as = 'nobody else went except me' and 'nobody else went except (that) I (went)', and as these mean precisely the same thing, both are pronounced grammatically correct. (See Latham, Eng. Lang. ed. 1850, p. 483; also F. Hall, Modern English 104, 303, notes.) In colloquial use me, us, etc., are more common than I, we, etc.; in literary use, the point is usually avoided by substituting except, save, or otherwise altering the phraseology. In certain phrases the conjunctional but develops, by ellipsis of a preceding negative, the adverbial sense 'only': see C. 6 below. Otherwise the modern use of but as a preposition or adverb is only Scotch; the form BOUT which was the regular ME. repr. of OE. bútan as prep. and adv. having become obsolete by 1500.]

C. conj.

General Scheme. I. In a simple sentence. II. In a complex sentence. III. In a compound sentence, or introducing a consequent sentence. IV. In phrases.

I. In a simple sentence; introducing a word or phrase (rarely a clause) which is excepted from the general statement: Without, with the exception of, except, save.

1. After universal statements with all, every, any.

†a. In OE. construed as a prep. with dative. (See A. 3.)

a 1000 Beowulf 705 (Z.) Ealle buton anum. c 1000 ÆLFRIC Job (Ettm.) iv. 15 Ealle þa þing .. buton þam anum.

b. In ME. and modern use weakened to a conjunction, as in 3 and 4.

c 1460 Towneley Myst. 23 Alle shalle be slayn but oonely we. a 1835 MRS. HEMANS Casabianca 2 The boy stood on the burning deck, Whence all but he had fled. 1872 J. H. NEWMAN Disc. & Arguments 6, I am one among a thousand; all of them wrong but I. [Colloq. also, 'but me'.]

(b) Otherwise, on account of the levelling of inflexions, the case is not shown, or may be independent of but (quot. a 1000), or but introduces a phrase.

a 1000 Panther 16 (Gr.) Se is æthwam freond butan dracan anum. a 1300 Cursor M. 763 Sua do we [ete] Of al þe tres bot of an. 1423 JAS. I King's Q. 94 With wingis bright, all plumyt, bot his face. 1596 Edw. III, II. i. 13 Wisdom is foolishness, but in her tongue. 1599 NASHE Christ's T. 57 b, If wee did imitate ought but the imperfections of Beastes. a 1618 RALEIGH Verses (Mildmay MS.) Love all eaten out but in outward showe. 1681 DRYDEN Abs. & Achit. 56 And thought that all but Savages were Slaves. 1802 MAR. EDGEWORTH Moral T. (1816) I. ix. 68, I can bear any thing but contempt. 1838 THIRLWALL Greece V. xxxix. 81 It [an oath] was taken .. by all but the Eleans. Mod. Anything but that! Any one but a fool would understand. Anywhere but in England. At any time but the present. Everybody but you has signed.

c. all but: everything short of. Hence, advb. Almost, very nearly, well nigh: see ALL A. 8 b.

2. After only, or a superlative. Const. as in 1 b.

1580 NORTH Plutarch 672 The first time that ever the two Kings were of one House but then. Mod. The only person I have met but you. He is last but one in the class.

3. After interrogatives (who, what, etc.) but was already in OE. construed as a conjunction, not affecting the case of the following sb. or pronoun, which depends upon the expansion of its own clause. This appears to have been universal in ME., and is regular now. Only rarely in modern times is but treated as a preposition governing the word.

a. With pronouns showing the case.

a 1000 Crist 695 (Gr.) Hwæt sindon þa gimmas butan god sylfe. c 1380 WYCLIF Serm. Sel. Wks. I. 279 Who shulde be dampned but þou? 1782 COWPER Gilpin 113 Away went Gilpin—who but he? 1777 SHERIDAN Sch. Scand. 231 Come —for, but thee, who seeks the Muse? Mod. Is there any one in the house but she? (or but her?) Who could have done it but he? (or but him?).

b. Otherwise the case is not shown, or is objective independently of but.

c 1300 Cato Major IV. v, What prou may þi catel do But hele wol with þe dele? c 1440 Gesta Rom. (1878) 123 What dude he but yede, and purveyde him of iij. cautils. 1576 GASCOIGNE Steel Gl. (Arb.) 60 What causeth this, but Rev.* 339 Who but the most desperate adventurers.. could at all have thought of [it]. 1872 BLACK Adv. Phaeton xxiv. 336 What must she do but immediately turn to the Lieutenant? Mod. Whom could he mean but me? Why have they come but to annoy us?

4. So after a negative, expressed or implied. (Here but regularly translates L. nisi, and may be explained as 'unless, if not'. It has been treated as a conjunction from the earliest times.)

†a. With sb. or pron. as compl. to be: see 6 a.

c 893 K. ÆLFRED Oros. 1. i, þær næran butan twegen dælas. a 1225 Leg. Kath. 282 þer nis bot a Godd. c 1240 Ureisun in Lamb. Pl. C. 1. 205 Ther þe cat nys bote a kyton. Ibid. xx. 149 Alle þre nys bote o god.

Also in extended use, esp. the centrist attitudes and policies which, according to many commentators, influenced both Labour and Conservative parties during the post-war period, leading to a previously unexpected measure of agreement on such matters as law, education, social policy, and defence.

'Yes, he [sc. Richard Fort MP] did invent 'Butskellism'. It was over lunch at the Reform; Norman McRae (our host) completed the trio... We were having a general discussion about the political-cum-economic situation, and it is our recollection that Richard coined the actual word. Norman then went off and wrote the Economist leader.' — Sir I. Trethowan, in private letter to Sir E. W. Playfair (1987).

[1954 Economist 13 Feb. 440/1 Mr Butskell is already a well-known figure in dinner table conversations in both Westminster and Whitehall, and the time has come to introduce him to a wider audience. butt (bʌt), sb.[3] Forms: 5 bott, butte, 5–8 but, 7– butt. [First appears in 15th c., but must be much older if BUTTOCK (13th c.) be a dim. of it. Of obscure etymology: words apparently cognate are ON. butt-r ('short' Vigf.; but occurring only as a nickname); Da., LG. but, Du. bot, blunt, short, thickset, stumpy; Sp., Pg. boto blunt, F. bot in pied-bot (club foot). F. bout end (OF. also bot, but) is apparently not connected with these words. It has naturally been thought of as the source of the Eng. word, but it does not appear to be recorded in the specific sense of 'thick end'. But cf. BUTT sb.[7]]

1. a. The thicker end of anything, esp. of a tool or weapon, the part by which it is held or on which it rests; e.g. the lower end of a spear-shaft, whip-handle, fishing-rod, the broad end of the stock of a gun or pistol.
